Fund Commentary

Markets delivered mixed returns during September as resilient economic growth and continued artificial-intelligence investment were offset by rising interest rates, higher bond yields and renewed inflation concerns. Technology-related companies generally outperformed, while traditional and interest-rate-sensitive sectors faced greater pressure.

Meta Platforms was a leading contributor, rising approximately 26% following AI-focused product announcements that increased confidence in the commercial potential of its consumer ecosystem. Applied Materials gained 11%, supported by growing demand for advanced semiconductor-manufacturing capacity, while Lumentum rose 6% as AI data-centre investment strengthened expectations for high-speed optical networking demand. These companies illustrate how AI-related expenditure is extending beyond major technology platforms into the semiconductor equipment, connectivity and digital infrastructure required to support advanced computing.

Within Australasia, CSL advanced 8.8% as investor confidence recovered and developments across its influenza-vaccine franchise supported sentiment. Mercury NZ gained 6.3%, benefiting from a constructive backdrop for electricity generators as the market considered security of supply, demand growth and the need for new generation investment.

Fixed income markets were volatile as several major central banks tightened policy. US government bond yields rose materially, with the 10-year Treasury yield reaching 5.3% and the 30-year yield reaching 5.6%. Higher yields created near-term valuation pressure but also improved the income available from quality fixed income securities.

Looking ahead, diversified portfolios continue to benefit from exposure to multiple sources of return. Structural growth themes, including artificial intelligence and digital infrastructure, remain attractive, while fixed income can offer attractive yields and portfolio diversification. With monetary policy becoming more restrictive and the gap between market winners and losers widening, active asset allocation and security selection remain important. We continue to emphasise portfolio resilience, quality, valuation discipline and an appropriate balance between growth and defensive assets.
